Course Description

This course introduces students to the core concepts of comparative politics, the study of political institutions, processes, and outcomes within and across countries. It explores major themes in contemporary comparative politics. The first term examines democratic institutions and political behaviour, including electoral systems, forms of government, political representation, political parties, and why and how citizens vote and participate in politics. The second term turns to the state and political regimes, including the origins of the modern state, the meaning and measurement of democracy, the economic and cultural determinants of democratisation, democratic transitions, and how authoritarian regimes work and perform.

Assessment

Full assessment briefs and marking criteria are available in the Assessments folder on Blackboard.

Summative 1: Written Assessment (50%)

Format: individual essay, 2,000 words, submitted via Turnitin on Blackboard.

Deadline: 11.59am, Friday 29 January 2027.

Answer one of the following questions:

1. Rational choice theory is the dominant explanation of electoral participation. Discuss.
2. Why do women continue to face barriers to achieving descriptive representation in democratic politics?
3. Partisanship remains the most important determinant of voting behaviour. Discuss.
4. Plurality electoral systems are fundamentally flawed and should not be used. Discuss.

Formative Essay

Format: individual essay, 1,000 words, submitted via Blackboard.

Deadline: 11.59am, Friday 5 March 2027.

Marking criteria: 2 Written Assessments (with empirical analysis)

Question: How should we measure democracy? Justify your answer referencing existing measurements and consider the validity of them.

Permission to submit after the deadline must be sought directly from your seminar leader and will be given only in exceptional circumstances (e.g. serious illness).

Summative 2: Group Project (50%)

Format: group report, 2,000 words, plus an individual survey response. The report is submitted by the designated group submitter and the survey by each student, via Turnitin on Blackboard.

Deadline: 11.59am, Monday 3 May 2027.

Task: Examine the theory and empirical evidence underpinning the democratisation of one of the following countries: South Korea, Indonesia, Chile or Poland.

Readings

The readings for each lecture are grouped into three categories.

Introductory reading. These readings provide a foundational understanding of the topics covered in each week. They might be especially helpful if you need to reinforce or revisit concepts that may already be familiar to you. These are often chapters from the recommended textbook for the module.

Essential reading. These are the key texts, often referred to in lectures and seminars. You should complete these readings before the associated lecture or seminar, whichever comes first, to fully understand and participate in discussions.

Additional reading. A selection of supplementary texts, which provide important additional perspectives or evidence. These readings can help you start gaining a more comprehensive understanding of the topics covered in each week's lectures and seminars; however, they do not include everything available on the subject.

Recommended Textbook

Firstly, you are not required to buy a textbook for this module. We will provide you with all essential readings in digital form. However, the following textbook could be a valuable resource, bridging the gap between A-Level politics and the more advanced essential readings. It is an excellent introduction to the study of comparative politics, covering many of the module's topics across both terms.

- Clark, W.R., Golder, M. and Golder, S.N. (2018) Principles of comparative politics. Third edition. Thousand Oaks, CA: SAGE/CQ Press.

A limited number of copies are available through the library. If you decide to buy your own copy, please know that older editions of the book are perfectly suitable and can often be found online for a lower price.

There are also numerous textbooks that may also be useful and will be available for you to use both in the library and can also be picked up second hand for a good price. These include:

- Caramani, D. (ed.) (2023) Comparative politics. Sixth edition. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Caramani, D. (2020) Comparative politics. Fifth edition. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kesselman, M., Krieger, J. and Joseph, W.A. (2013) Introduction to comparative politics. 6th ed., International ed. Belmont, Calif: Wadsworth.
- Krieger, J. (2019) Introduction to comparative politics: political challenges and changing agendas. 8th edition. Edited by M. Kesselman and W.A. Joseph. Boston, MA: Cengage Learning.
- Newton, K. and Deth, J.W. van (2021) Foundations of comparative politics: democracies of the modern world. Fourth edition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Newton, K. and Deth, J.W. van (2016) Foundations of comparative politics: democracies of the modern world. Third edition. Cambridge, United Kingdom: Cambridge University Press.

Michaelmas Term

Lecturer: Kevin Wu

Lecture 1: Introduction to the Module and the Study of Comparative Politics

This lecture starts off by introducing the content of the module with brief overviews of assessment and our expectations of students. Following on from this a more substantive section considers the method of comparative politics, and what we aim to achieve in this discipline of politics.

Introductory reading

- Clark, W.R., Golder, M. and Golder, S.N. (2018) Principles of comparative politics. Third edition. Thousand Oaks, CA: SAGE/CQ Press. [Chapters 1–3]

Essential reading

Lecture 4: Political Representation

In this week, we explore the concept and types of political representation, with a focus on parliamentary representation. What factors do explain why some countries have more diverse parliaments than others? We will pay special attention to both supply and demand factors. We will explore the factors that help explain why some are more descriptively representative, whether it is desirable and makes a difference and what can be made to make our parliaments more diverse.

Lecture 6: Electoral Participation

This week surveys literature that explores why do people vote and when they vote. We start with the paradox of voting in rational choice and then explore a number of individual, social and institutional factors that affect the decision to participate in elections. We also explore voter decision-making and discuss core theories in political science that aim to explain why do people choose to vote the way they do.

Lecture 8: Vote Choice

This week we will read about how we choose who to vote for. We will examine some of the institutional explanations of vote choice and how these impact the types of choices we have. We will also explore some of the differences in individual level theories of vote choice that explain variations in vote choice patterns around the world.

Lecture 9: The State

How do states form? How do strong states form? This lecture explores the background to the formation of the Modern State and considers two opposing theoretical views; the contractarian view and the predatory view. We consider what the role of the state is and how these two different perspectives help to tell us something about the modern state while considering the merits and flaws of each perspective.

Lecture 10: What Is Democracy?

In this lecture, we explore the nature of democracy. We consider contrasting opinions over what it is and how we can define it clearly to allow us to establish whether a country is to be considered a democracy or not. The second part of this lecture considers how we can empirically operationalise our conceptions of democracy. What types of things can we look at as evidence for the existence of democracy? Finally, we consider how much measurement actually matters.

Lecture 11: Democratisation 1: Economic Determinants

What is the relationship between economic development and democracy? What is the resource curse, and does it affect democratisation? This week we will focus on some of the core questions that exist surrounding the economic determinants of democracy. We will explore traditional theories such as modernisation and look at the strengths and weaknesses of their claims before going on to look at resource curse and the role of inequality in shaping democracy.

Lecture 12: Democratisation 2: Cultural Determinants of Democracy

Are there preconditions for Democratization? Is there a relationship between religion and democratisation? How do societal factors affect the chances of democratisation? This week we look at the role of social and cultural factors in relation to democratisation. We start off by examining the background to the role of culture before moving on to ask whether some religions are incompatible with democracy.

Lecture 13: Democratic Transitions

In the last two weeks we have explored structural theories of democratisation, but these themselves have been subject to criticism not just on empirical grounds, but also because the structural approach is in desperate need of switching from looking at “causes to causers” of democratization (Huntington, 1991). This week, we introduce the role of agency in the story of democratisation looking at competing ideas underpinning top-down transitions and bottom-up transitions. We explore cases and the empirical evidence to support these theoretical models of transition.

Lecture 14: Do Democracies Perform Better than Dictatorships?

The push towards democratisation is often seen as being highly beneficial for those that reside within that state. But is this the case? Do democracies actually outperform dictatorships? This week we start to explore this question by examining state performance in a range of democracies and dictatorships.

Lecture 15: Classifying Authoritarian Regimes

What makes authoritarian regimes endure? What are the tools autocrats use to stay in power? Are there some conditions that make the survival of dictators more likely? This week we explore the different types of authoritarian regimes and consider what impact their various designs has on their ability to remain in power.
